The concentrations of specific IgA and IgG serum antibodies to the most common viral and bacterial antigens in patients with squamous cell and basal cell epithelioma of the skin have been compared to those in healthy persons. The correlation between the degree of malignancy of tumor tissue and the content of specific serum IgG antibodies to the viral antigens has been evaluated. The study has shown that the level of specific serum IgA in patients with squamous cell and basal cell epithelioma is similar to that in healthy persons and cannot serve as a diagnostic criterion for the prognosis of disease. The level of specific serum IgG in patients with keratotic epithelioma drops by 2-3 times and this enables to conclude that the disease is primarily associated with the presence of viral antigens in the epidermis.
