Chronic myelogenous leukaemia (CML) is the classical example of a neoplasm caused by a single transformed stem cell that has lost control of the differentiation program. CML is characterized by the presence of a permanently enlarged leukaemic phase and a variable myeloid phase with a predominance of myeloid derived cells. The leukaemic phase is characterized by the presence of a large clone of hematopoietic precursors derived from a single cell that has undergone clonal evolution. Molecular genetic studies have shown that CML is monoclonal (origin from a single hematopoietic stem cell), and that the BCR-ABL oncogene is the sole transforming event. The myeloid phase in CML is not homogeneous and appears to be composed of a proliferating non-differentiated myeloid clone and mature dysmyelinated myeloid cells derived from the CD34+ progenitor cell. The non-differentiated cells are characterized
