Many digital devices today use a form of memory that has states in which they store information. Memory cells have state levels in which they store different quantities of charge. One example of a way to store states in memory is the flip-flop. Flip-flops have a circuit composed of a chain of transistor switches so that the output is the logical OR of the inputs. A simple example is a chain of inverters so that current is fed through the inverter chain from a power supply. Each transistor has one of two states, a '0' and a '1'. If the first inverter is set as a '0' output, current will flow through the chain, turning on the first transistor and causing the inverter chain to switch the output as a '1'. Thus, each transistor is a data storage element that stores a value. The output of the chain is its state, which can be assumed as either a '0' or a '1'. Memory cells in various digital applications can be polarized, meaning they can be charged to different levels before they are written to store data. In one example, a memory cell can be charged to indicate a '1'. When the cell is read, its logic is determined by which side of a threshold line that it is on. The threshold line is programmed so that it indicates a '1'
