I have a program that needs to be run as root for long periods of time. What are the potential hazards of doing this? How does Linux try to handle situations where the system goes stale? Is there an API provided to the program to tell it to restart at some point? I understand that being a root user can be dangerous, for example, you can't delete things, you have to be careful not to overflow memory, and even minor crashes can make things hang indefinitely. But I'm concerned that using root for other reasons -- like networking -- will make things worse. It can be argued that it doesn't matter what the security impact is, because the system is going to be restarted eventually. But in the event of a system crash, the process may not restart. I'm not familiar enough with Linux to know how to tell it to force a restart, for example, as opposed to a process that is still running, but has failed.
