The AC coupling causes video band harmonics to be added together with the desired frequency component, making it impossible to separate from the desired 60 Hz component using simple bandpass filtering. If the 60 Hz component is completely filtered out, the video band harmonics, which have the same amplitude as the 60 Hz component, will remain in the output signal. Harmonic cancellation techniques for video band signals have been proposed, however, they can introduce phase and amplitude errors in the desired signal. These errors become more pronounced in the presence of
