Volumes of material are lost because they are too valuable to toss into the regular recycling stream, but the current methods of recycling are insufficient. "We are at a turning point where materials and energy are becoming more expensive and, consequently, the economics of recycling are changing," said Jason Bassig, president of the Recycling Materials Association. "At least 30% of our product line is made from virgin metal or rubber. Very few consumers are willing to pay more than 10 to 15% more for products made from recycled materials, which means that the continued use of virgin metal and rubber is not sustainable." For example, in the food industry, recycled food waste, primarily from restaurants, is used as fertilizer. The recycled content of materials typically uses valuable gold and silver, but some plastics are used in products, as well. Recycled content increases in a product as virgin content decreases. "The challenge for the recycling industry is to create novel products and processes that can compete economically with the 100% virgin material, or further improve in terms of the ecological and economic sustainability," Bassig said. "In that respect, recycled material in plastic bags may become the 21st century
