HyperMotion Technology was developed in conjunction with the leading motion capture technology provider, PrimeSense, and it will be implemented in FIFA on PC, PlayStation 4 and Xbox One. The technology, combined with new animations and a new dribbling system, resulted in a competitive advantage in FIFA 21. The central focus of the development team has been to improve the most important aspects of the gameplay, rather than the controls or other aspects of the game. This means the new dribbling system is the most visible feature of this build, but the underlying code is in place to support it. This is another game-changer - the real-life player physics have been integrated into the core simulation, with the game moving in a natural progression of skills from footwork, trapping, jumping, attacking, ball control, shooting and passing. This will improve not only the movement of players and the ball, but the entire gameplay, and its connections with the physics simulation. The team has also improved ball physics; players are now able to control shots more accurately, the pressure points, trajectory, and flight time of the ball are very realistic, and the “sweet spots” that change based on player and team’s styles. Many of these changes are invisible to the players, but are in place to ensure realistic gameplay. Another breakthrough is the implementation of “Dynamic Tactical AI”. The tactical decision-making AI has been rewritten to be more intelligent. The new version is very adaptive, and will take into account not only the vision and experience of the players, but also the opposition, team-mates, specific situations and timing. Both the tactics and player’s positioning on the pitch is in place to support the AI in all aspects of the game. The ball flow has also been significantly improved. It is now more realistic, the creation of more dramatic situations, and the way the ball move across the pitch in possession. The rework of the shooting mechanics, including shooting power, accuracy, and placement, has taken a significant step forward. The skill of a player and his team’s movement affects his ability to fire shots on goal. This brings us to the new dribbling system, which is a breakthrough for gameplay in FIFA. This is the most important aspect of the game, and it has now been completely overhauled. It integrates all the underlying AI, player and team movement, ball physics, situation and more to give players a chance
