A fundamental question in ecology is to understand the environmental conditions that influence biodiversity. In this study, we tackle this question by combining artificial intelligence and robotics to map the ecological niche of the material-carrying moth Neoporthetes roseatus (Lepidoptera, Noctuidae). This moth is widely distributed in urban environments in the world and is known to carry urinary odors. This species is a suitable case to validate the potential use of an autonomous mobile robot for collecting information at a low cost and in an open environment. In this study, we use data collected from a mobile robot from the geographic coordinates of individual larvae, thus moving it on the environment to capture all the spatial variability of the larval distribution. Information about the distribution of the larval population is obtained from a modified version 0cc13bf012
