The adsorption of gaseous CH₄ on Pd(110) surface has been investigated using first-principles calculations based on the density functional theory. The original Pd(110) surface and its relaxed D(110) surface, corresponding to the atomic configuration of the ideal surface Pt(110), are studied as reference. The adsorption of CH₄ molecules and formation of new bonds are analyzed in detail. A number of adsorption sites have been identified, and the corresponding adsorption energies are presented. The results show that CH₄ molecules prefer on-top sites and the formation of new bonds between the adsorption site and the surface are driven by electrostatic interaction and dispersive force.

Q: How to use MongoDB C# driver to insert documents in a single collection from a CSV File I want to write a C# console application that will read a CSV (tab-separated) file and insert each row's data into a MongoDB collection. Is there a CSV reader that will directly use the C# driver to do this? If not, can anyone point me to a tutorial on how to read a CSV file and use the C# driver to insert the data into a MongoDB collection? A: MongoDB Driver has a CSV reader implementation and it's completely independent of the language used on your PC. C# is just the language you're using to build the program, not the language you're using to query the database. The MongoDB driver uses the MongoDB JSON protocol, so you can use any language that talks JSON to get up-to-date changes into the database, if you're using an X.0 version of the driver. From a high level perspective, the driver's JSON protocol is: send data as a single JSON document, standardize the metadata before sending the document, standardize the storage format of the document and metadata, standardize the way to find documents in MongoDB standardize the way to get
