andÂ .DESCRIPTION: Clostridium difficile is a major pathogen that causes morbidity and mortality in both children and adults. Despite all the strains of C. difficile, none are harmless; none can be identified as normal intestinal flora; and all contain large quantities of a potent cytotoxin. The severe enterocolitis that the toxin causes is problematic in all age groups. Unfortunately, little is known about the basic features of C. difficile that allow it to be such a good opportunist. The intention of this project is to determine how C. difficile is able to multiply in the colonic environment, spread from one individual to another, and avoid immune responses by evading the cell mediated immune response that is normally responsible for bacterial clearance and the mobilization of polymorphonuclear leukocytes (PMN) and macrophages that can damage the colon. The following specific aims are proposed: 1) How is the colonization and growth of C. difficile regulated in vivo? 2) How do C. difficile strains in the two infantile forms of C. difficile-associated disease (CAD) and adults, differ? 3) How can the virulence of C. difficile be changed?
