Tomato Jones was created by Nathan Baca Baca in 1998, and claims over one billion downloads on the App Store and Mac App Store. Since he first released the game in November of 1998, he's worked tirelessly to support the player base for more than 10 years. In 2013 he gave up on version 1.x (which had grown too unwieldy) and released 2.0 and his most current version is currently at v4.0.xxx (though the version currently "in public" still shows v2.1). The gameplay and mechanic is based on Robotron 2084. Put the base cards in place and click on each of them to spin the player to the corresponding place where he or she can move around. Place the selected items, and they will rotate the player to the corresponding next place. Movement is left and right, as on Robotron, but there is no up. There is also a card to hold that allows it to be moved forward and backwards. Cards in the player's inventory, besides the drop cards and the report card, only move the player forward or backwards. The 'in place' cards on the board move the player to a new adjacent tile of their corresponding color. If the player is adjacent to an in-place tile of the same color, then the color will be changed. That is to say that if a green tile is adjacent to a green tile, it will change to blue. The game is designed to work with 2 or more players. You have access to four types of items: Red: Drop cards with coins on them. There is 1 drop card for 1 coin. When you clear a tile with all of its in place coins and no other player also has the same type of coins, those coins are dropped and you get an additional one. Red items take precedence over all other card types. Yellow: Items that give the player short boosts. There is 1 item of this type in the game. Short boost items take precedence over all other card types. Green: Items that push the player forward or backward. There is 1 item of this type in the game. Items with the same type (forward or backward) cannot be stacked on top of one another. Green items take precedence over all other card types. Blue: Items that clear the tiles around the player. There is 1 item of this type in the game. Blue items take precedence over all other types. Green items, the push items,
