Q: Proper understanding of the available Resource Manager modes in Windows 7 I want to know the proper understanding of the available Resource Manager modes in Windows 7. For example for the %Windir%\system32\config\system file I can set the "Accessed" Date fields on the Properties dialog to a specific time. Is the set of data available in the "Full Date Time" column (and the time from the "Accessed" to "Full Date Time" fields) a proper representation of the file access times? If not, what is the proper way of representing the access times for user and for kernel mode access? A: I think this is what you are looking for: An access time (also referred to as last access time, modification time, or changed time) is the date and time that a file or directory is last accessed by a program. This value is retrieved from or updated by the file or directory information. If a file last accessed, but no change time was recorded for the file, the changed time is set to the last access time.... A timestamp is typically written by software as a series of bytes. Modern high-end microprocessors provide a non-volatile hardware counter, called a timestamp counter, which increments every time there is an event on the processor. Timestamps are used by operating systems to record and maintain the timestamps of software objects to permit efficient recovery from system crashes. Source: As for what you are trying to track I would just use %Systemroot%\System32\Config\system, %Systemroot%\System32\Config\volatile.dmp, %Systemroot%\System32\Config\cfg.bin, %Systemroot%\System32\Config\rs.dat, or %SYSTEMROOT%\System32\Config\rsx.dat
