What happens if the tie is installed and the water content. Pack Content.. Even the most challenging environments such as offshore, oil rigs,.Polishing a stainless steel duct or fitting is a difficult task. The action of a grinder, for example, tends to create very fine particulate matter that can become lodged between the adjacent surfaces of the ducts. Various devices for deburring a sharp edge have been developed in the past. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 6,257,328 (the '328 patent) to Robinson et al. discloses a deburring apparatus for deburring a sharp edge formed by an outside edge of a pipe. The apparatus includes a spindle having a sharp edge for deburring. The apparatus further includes a housing, and a motor and drive shaft coupled to the spindle and extending through a hole formed in the housing. The apparatus includes an aperture formed through the housing for containing debris created by the spindle in contact with the edges of the pipes. The spindle further includes a groove formed on the end of the spindle for containing the debris that is created when the spindle contacts the edges of the pipe. The apparatus further includes a breaker ring formed on the spindle for breaking off debris that is stuck between the sharp edge of the spindle and the sharp edge of the pipe. The apparatus further includes a vacuum pump coupled to the breaker ring for drawing air through the aperture in the housing. While the deburring apparatus of the '328 patent may be useful for cleaning pipes, it appears that it may not be useful for cleaning a sharp edge of a duct or fitting.

Furthermore, the vacuum source of the deburring apparatus may not be suitable for use with the sharp edge of a duct or fitting. Another prior art device used for deburring is the “Hummer® Sand-Blaster”, produced by the Land and Buildings division of CTS Inc. This device includes a rotating drum that is actuated to pinch a duct or fitting and rapidly rotate the duct or fitting about a rotational axis. A vacuum source is used to remove the pinched and twisted material from the drum.

However, the rotational motion of the drum is not effective at removing particulate matter that has become trapped between the sharp edge of the duct and the sharp edge of another duct. The inability to effectively remove particulate matter between the sharp edges of adjacent ducts is especially true with respect to rigid and non-rigid duct assemblies. In these duct assemblies,
