Considerable efforts have been directed to the design of special purpose enzymatic systems that can carry out chemical transformations in synthetically useful ways. In order to do this, it is necessary to create a synthetic enzyme that possesses certain characteristics. These include the ability to catalyze an economically and stoichiometrically useful transformation, the ability to do so in a nonenzymatic fashion, and the ability to be recovered and reused without recourse to harsh or environmentally undesirable operating conditions. While considerable attention has been devoted to the design and construction of catalytic enzymes, only recently have systems been studied which make use of catalytic ribozymes. Ribozymes are catalytic RNAs which have been shown to possess all of the properties required of a useful, synthetic enzyme. That is d0c515b9f4
