traditional PHP/MySQL backend. I'd like to load and display a single page that changes dynamically depending on the unique conditions of the user that is accessing the web app. Users have a profile where they can enter personal information, and based on their input a number of specific pages will be dynamically loaded and displayed on the web page. This works for typical PHP applications on the server with MySQL databases, but I'm not sure how to handle this dynamic nature in the browser itself and keep the data securely.

I'm a bit lost as to the best way to tackle this. I'm working on a simple website that has a single main page that can change content depending on who is accessing the page, but how would the back-end handle this? What would the backend look like and how would it store user-specific data and keep it secure? A: We have a bunch of customers who use SSO (Single Sign On) from our server to different sites. We have MySQL databases (user profiles, user information, etc) on our servers and other databases (user activity, shopping baskets, user menus, etc) on each customers web sites.

One thing to note, we have a redirect on our
