The newest cybercrime bust of 2013 featured a quite remarkable twist, with a computer expert caught red-handed from Montreal. Amit Taneja, director of computer information security for NFO Group, a U.K. firm that supplies digital controls to the petrochemical industry, was nabbed at an airport in Montreal on Monday. He was about to board a flight to Romania to attend a computer security conference. But he was stopped by the Canadian Border Services Agency, who searched his hard drive and discovered a host of previously undetected viruses, as well as several pirated computer games. Story continues below advertisement. The agents were very good. They tested my computer, they checked my hard drive. Mr. Taneja said. Canada's international partners, the U.S. and the U.K., have begun to take a much more aggressive stance in their battle against cybercrime. There are fears that, if left unchecked, the losses to Canadian business and to the health of the economy will be significant. The U.K., for example, loses about $1-billion a year to cybercrime. Existing measures introduced under the Anti-Terrorism Act fail to address this growing threat, said Andy Willian, a former U.K. government cyber-security adviser now working at cyber-security firm
