What's the point of making you wait when it's no fun anyway? These days, however, the hype train has moved on and the new Pixel 4 and Pixel 4 XL are going to be arriving in a couple of weeks. And as a preview of the design direction Google is taking with its second line of devices, there is much I want to talk about. But first, let's say a few words about the software and hardware. In the lead-up to yesterday's big announcement, I spent a good deal of time talking with the folks over at Google about what made it important to them to "resume" Android. More importantly, I spent time talking about how the simplicity of Android is something that Android fans have always respected and admired. The Pixel 4 will be launching with Android 9.0 Pie and the Pixel range, including the Pixel 3 and Pixel 3 XL, will be launching with Android 10. Now, this shouldn't be seen as just something Google is doing for the sake of it. The Pixel 4 is a beta device, meaning that the software should be growing and improving for quite a few more months before release. At the same time, Android 10 is looking like one of the most significant updates ever, and that's not the case for all previous versions of Android. There was never a doubt in my mind that Google was moving away from the modular approach. No matter how good I think Google's decision making has been for Android, the Pixel 3 XL and 3a had a very different ethos. There is no chance that Google will ever launch a new version of Android without Google Assistant. That's a fact. So now that we know what I think of this new direction, what do you think? Will the Pixel 4 and 4 XL continue the 6d1f23a050
