Diabetes mellitus is known for its negative influence on cardiovascular system and all known risk factors for atherosclerosis like hyperlipidemia or hypertension are clearly elevated. Impaired glucose tolerance (IGT) and diabetes are leading risk factors for heart diseases. The question is, if the dyslipidemia of IGT patients is more severe than the dyslipidemia of normoglycaemic subjects and if the residual risk of developing diabetes mellitus is higher after improvement of dyslipidemia and glucose tolerance. We investigated this aspect in the process of therapeutic statin treatment in IGT and diabetes type 2 in patients with stable angina pectoris. These results were compared with patients without a prior history of dyslipidemia who served as controls. The study group (IGT + diabetes) and the control group were comparable concerning gender, age, body mass index, fasting glucose and insulin, HbA1c, total cholesterol, LDL-cholesterol, triglycerides, HDL-cholesterol and triglyceride/HDL-cholesterol ratio. LDL and total cholesterol were comparable in both groups. Mean values were: 119 +/- 27 mg/dl (IGT + diabetes) and 109 +/- 29 mg/dl (control). HDL-cholesterol was 36 +/- 10 mg/dl in the study group and 50 +/- 13 mg/dl in the control group. There was no significant difference between the study group and the control group concerning dyslipidemia (0.62 +/- 0.42 vs. 0.63 +/- 0.47). However, LDL/HDL-cholesterol ratio was significantly increased in the study group 0.40 +/- 0.07 vs. 0.31 +/- 0.05 in the control group (p #ifndef _ENDIAN_H #define _ENDIAN_H #include unsigned short swap_bits(unsigned short x) {
