Epitaxial graphene is an ideal two-dimensional material for studying the electric properties of graphene. The peculiar topography of the surface gives rise to a uniaxial electrostatic potential, which leads to the electric field distribution of a standing electrostatic wave (ESW), similar to those in semiconductors. The ESW mode arises from the in-plane electric field distribution, and the surface charge distribution is spatially modulated. The ESW results from the Coulomb interaction among the topographic charges. We develop a time-dependent statistical model to explain the current-induced ESW phenomenon. The results of analytical and numerical studies of the electric field distribution agree well with each other, and the model provides a clear physical picture of the ESW effect.Dynamically rotating birefringent diffraction gratings. We describe a novel type of dynamically rotating diffraction grating (DRGD) which produces no internal reflections, with respect to the incident beam, in the material supporting the grating. The grating is constructed using a SiO2 microwire which rotates in a transparent liquid. The DRGD is a circular bi-stable device whose operation is analogous to a self-actuated micro-mirror. This work demonstrates the potential of DRGD devices as micro-optical components and miniature cells.Presence of VOR in the inferior colliculus of the monkey (Macaca fascicularis). The function of the inferior colliculus in the central auditory system of the monkey is still uncertain. In the present study, we report an investigation of the vestibular receptors of the monkey inferior colliculus using both static and dynamic (rotational and translational) VOR stimulation. Our results show that the inferior colliculus receives afferents from the vestibular organ via the lateral semicircular canal. Static and dynamic VORs evoked

Typical techniques for analyzing urine specimens include enzyme linked immunosorbent assay, radioimmunoassay, and immunoprecipitation. As a supplement to these techniques, antibody immobilization techniques have been developed to permit the use of higher concentrations of immunoglobulins, with a resultant increased sensitivity. The specific technique to be applied is dependent on the particular diagnostic problem being analyzed. However, another important role for immobilized antibodies is to capture target substances in a molecular filter format, preventing non-specific elution of urine components. This capture technique could be applied to an array of antibodies on the surface of the filter to separate and identify a target analyte from a complex mixture. 6d1f23a050
