This study was performed to determine whether there is a relationship between the foci of computed axial tomography (CAT) abnormalities and biopsy-confirmed disordered tissue (bacteremia). The study group consisted of 110 patients who were evaluated for indwelling central venous catheters, percutaneous drainages or prosthetic heart valves with CAT scanning. Abnormalities were identified by one of two radiologists who were aware of the presence or absence of a terminal catheter or a prosthetic valve. The reports were compared with biopsy reports. Comparison was possible in 108 patients. Abnormalities, when identified, were classified as low-attenuation (less than -20 HU) or high-attenuation (greater than -20 HU) foci of enhancement. Fifty-three percent of all foci were related
