It's not that I'm not interested in technology - I'm not (I even blog for a living, as I write about the things I'm interested in). However, as I've written, I have spent a lot of my professional life working with business leaders, one of whom has become my friend. More importantly, I've worked with a large number of young people, all at different stages of their careers, and there is something about the way that they work together that is changing my world. For the last few years, I've been involved in a research project, looking at the way that young people work with older people and vice versa. It's called 'Realising Digital Differences' and I'm one of the authors. In the past few months, we've been focusing on people aged 30-40, as we really wanted to hear from younger people. I've been focussing on a fairly limited slice of the project, looking at the way that the people I've met are utilising the resources of their organisations. At first, this hasn't been very encouraging. One of the key messages from our participants has been that they didn't expect to be able to do much work in their jobs with 'mature' people. They felt that they needed to find their own niche, where they felt they would fit. As a result, they were prepared to compromise
