Critics have noted the self-conscious pretensions of that film, and of the audio book adaptation of its story. Heart of Darkness is so far, in fact, from this fictional character of an ordinary man who goes out to fight a war that it should be surprising to many that he is even called John Marlow. It took me a while to get used to that, but now I love it. Marlow is no anti-hero, but he is no hero either. He is just a guy, struggling to decide whether he wants to go fight the German Army in the jungles of Indochina, or be there to support his wife and little daughter back home. He seems to be split between the two, struggling with what his life is to be. In a wonderfully subtle and understated way, Coppola uses Marlow to express the philosophical conflicts of a whole generation of Americans living in the aftermath of World War II. And those conflicts are just as relevant today as when Conrad wrote about them more than 70 years ago. Heart of Darkness has a long and fascinating back-story. It was written in 1885, as Conrad was in the middle of writing his first novel, The Secret Agent (Conrad called it an experiment). Conrad wrote to his mentor, John Galsworthy, about his experiences on the Congo River, which resulted in his writing Heart of Darkness. Conrad kept writing short stories on the Congo, and finished it with the last one, The Heart of Darkness. This was Conrad's first novel, written between 1885 and 1886. It was published in 1890. The Heart of Darkness is the culmination of his experiences as a man fighting to keep his humanity, after trying to kill himself on that river and watching his friend die. It is about a man who has found his humanity, and has lost it, and has been recast into a monster, he who, before, was nothing but a man. Conrad has said that Marlow is the character whom the Congo had taken most from him, to a tragic end.
