Another plus point is the better white balance performance in lighting conditions than the classic models, which were capable of a W blue balance in some lighting conditions. I am not sure what this means. I know that Spyder is pretty good at calibrating and matching color in dull lighting but with the Spyder4 Elite I must say I would be very surprised to see such a big difference in performance. However, If I could say this is Spyder not giving much more accuracy it would be even better. What a surprise... As for the software, it does not have much in common with the X-Rite software interface for Windows users except for a few aspects. From the get go, Xrite's software does not appeal to me. It is very simple, but there are buttons everywhere and information is displayed like in a gallery. You need to know how to use a mouse. On the other hand, Datacolor's software is far more colorful and resembles the appearance of photos taken with a camera. One point that I really like is the fact that Datacolor has replaced the profiling section with an application called Datacolor SpyderProof. The idea of this section is to recalibrate all the parameters stored by your calibration software to ensure that the profile is always correct in the future. The calibration task is a little complex and is difficult to grasp if you are a beginner in color management. I find it a bit counter-intuitive to recalibrate calibration stored parameters. As for the other benefits, the Spydery software is super fast, has an amazingly user-friendly interface that does not look cluttered, and it matches colors of non-spectral colors like gray or white with remarkable accuracy. Take your time to explore the software before buying this expensive piece of software as it can take you a lot of time to figure out all its features. You will know what to expect when it comes to the costs.
