however, if your windows xp is genuine and you have a valid product key, then you can activate it as usual. for example, if you purchase a product key from some website (they are very popular for this) but you are not sure if the key you have been given is genuine, it is a good idea to check the microsoft website, which has a database of valid windows xp product keys. you can then enter your windows xp product key into the activation dialog box. another method of activation is to use the windows xp activation tool, which you can obtain from microsoft. the activation tool will detect the product key on your cd-rom or floppy disk and activate your windows xp. you can also use the windows xp setup program to activate windows xp. you will have to access the setup program by selecting start/settings/control panel and opening the administrative tools control panel. once you have opened the control panel, select system/security/activation and then click activate now. in some cases the activation process will not succeed. for example, if your activation key is invalid or the activation has already been performed on your computer, the activation process will fail. in these cases, you will have to perform an upgrade and re-install windows xp. if you are using a vlk product key on windows xp, you must replace the vlk key with the product key from the actual product box you purchased. this will ensure that you will be able to activate your copy of windows xp.
