If you are looking to advance your photography beyond mere snapshots, you need a quality RAW conversion software and this one is amazing. It is the only one capable of converting RAW files, and it's close to as good as Photoshop when it comes to creating files. If you have a camera that shoots RAW, you must purchase this RAW converter! I tested Lightroom 4 when it was released, so I might be in a position of some bias. I'm not completely convinced that Lightroom is as much better than Photoshop as the hardware improvements in Lightroom 5 would lead one to believe. Lightroom 4's performance was dismal, and the new software still isn't much better. It's not particularly difficult to find Lightroom 4 articles online discussing the issue, and frankly, their observations mirror mine. Lightroom 4's SQLite database on the other hand, is quite capable of handling large catalogs. The outstanding performance of Lightroom 5's catalog is great, as is the new RAW processing tool. Even though Lightroom 5 is still in beta beta, the final release is already better than Photoshop CS5, and probably better than the final release of most other photo editing programs. For now, it's the best among Lightroom and Photoshop's competitors for RAW processing, even though until Adobe perfects its RAW processing algorithms, it might still be possible to enhance the appearance of a RAW file, no matter how- raw it is. Most of the features of Lightroom 5, including the speed enhancements that have been made, are excellent additions. However, the one major change that really sets Lightroom 5 apart from Lightroom 4 is the photographic presets. Rather than just taking screenshots of unique and amusing themes that have been created by other users, Adobe Lightroom 5 allows photographers to create their own.

What did I use to shoot this?

I had a high resolution 20M 5D (CF) that was about $6K. I took it out of the box with the Zuiko 10-18mm lens that came with it. I took a few pre-light setup photos--this was before the shot of the Day. Then we selected the flower, brought it to the location, and set up tripod, lens, and monitor. I made sure I was on Aperture and Av, set white balance, ISO, set Shutter speed, and pressed the button. 90% of the time it worked. The basics of the lighting set up

The purpose of the lighting was to match the environments in the wedding portraits. In most instances, flowers are outdoors and the only lighting is ambient. The higher the ambient light the more the shadow on the flower. So, I lit mostly in the ambient light--it's what is usually there. I also thought it looked really cool and difficult since the flowers were spread out and on the ground. I thought contrast was really high so I went with soft white shot on purpose.
