I found the interface of the new Adobe Lightroom 5 to be less intimidating than that of its predecessor. How could it be, knowing that the user's experience has been streamlined, with the new "drag and drop" feature? Still, you'll be jumping from one field to another in the catalog; for example, you'll be switching from the Library to the Adjustments to the History panel – which seems confusing, to say the least. It probably doesn't matter. Once you get the hang of it, the different panels and features of Lightroom 5 feel intuitive and easy to use. All told, though, I would have preferred if the interface were a little less cluttered. The interface is not, as I said before, less customized. It is customizable, however. I found it relatively easy to configure shortcuts at any time. It's easy to save catalogs and export them to a variety of formats, indicating that Lightroom 4 didn't have the power it should have had. Similarly, Lightroom 5 is, unquestionably, better than its predecessor in image quality. The largest difference – and the thing that first made me think about Lightroom 5 – is the change in tone-mapping, whereby image files now retain what they look like in the raw five-CCD (color camera), before they are edited in Lightroom. As a result, I now have fewer images crowded in my catalog, and I'll be able to find the ones I need much more easily.
