Sure, Apple could have added many more things inside iOS 11, like better division of labor, or better security, or even slower performance. But what really matters is what's outside the operating system because it defines what the iPad is for. And, judging from what I've seen, I have to say iOS 11 has some really great features for iPad. The camera is sharper, the apps have gotten a lot quicker and some of them, like Messages, are practically crammed with new features. But, like I mentioned before, some of those features come with trade-offs, such as a less stable keyboard and a laminated screen. But those trade-offs aren't overly significant. I still think iOS 11 has more to offer than iOS 10, especially if you're an iPhone user. iOS 11 is just Apple's latest tablet operating system, and a quality one, at that. Computer magazine's review of the new iPad Pros, as reported on Sept. 17, generally agreed that the iPad pros are great tablets and can be really powerful with the right apps. But, it also said they were disappointed that their most basic software - Word, Excel, PowerPoint - were not available to use on the all-new, first-ever iPad pros. While that may be in the future, it is to be noted that the iPad Pros and their prices are appealing and appear to have good market responses. It is those market responses across the whole industry that has Apple going the tablet way. Tablet sales are growing and Apple wants to make sure the iPad Pros are at the top of the heap.
