Choosing a reliable lumbar MRI has always required the presence of a "radiologist" (radiologist is a medical professional that may or may not be a radiologist). A radiologist has the authority to control the magnetic imaging process, which can include the power to "turn the machine on and off." There have been occasional instances in the news where radiology technicians were secretly experimenting with the scan button and left the machine on while participants filed out of the MRI. As the thinking goes, if you see the light go on you are safe! The implication here is that patients are left alone, and safe to enter the machine because they see a light go on indicating that the machine is operating. Obviously, if the lights were out the patients would be confined to an isolation unit where they could have their pain without risk. As we have noted, in current practice, many patients are not seen by persons who can control the "on or off" function. Many machines are not turned off because budget or resource limitations prevent the expenditure of the money to move a machine or purchase another. With rural hospitals, the cost of a portable MRI machine can be prohibitive. Physicians sign out the patient to technicians who have the authority to make the decisions. We "liveries" (Patient Information Leaflet) generally provide information that is too technical for the average patient to understand. They are written and provided to patients by technicians who may or may not be the person who operates the machine. There is no one medical reading the leaflet to ensure that it accurately describes what the machine will do. Patients are sometimes not told what the machine can do. Patients are sometimes told that they must be connected to a monitoring cable to use the machine, when the test is being performed without a connection. Reuse of patient portals (such as SpinLock) is common within clinics, but it is sold without explanation of a strict protocol to prevent misuse. Some portal owners allow employers to access some patient data, enabling an employer to control medical decisions. In this way, a medical community can end up in a situation where patient portal information can be used to lease medical decisions.
