The newest feature, Share for Review, is very interesting. It uses smart previews to make the given image look good the moment you open the file. The Preview Pane features a preset grid-based button to make the image look more polished, while the Grid and Perspective options can improve the image in those areas. Grab the new defaults, and you'll know everything you need to get the most out of the image. However, Lightroom still lacks a Booking feature. This option, from Adobe's Digital Publishing Suite, would let you address metadata quickly as it appears on a screen. It would be a further improvement to Lightroom. Of course, if you intend to work with photos in forums or online, Lightroom users can now have a Google+ account to share their photos and make posts. Another new feature I like is a Panorama option added when you connect an Android device. It is easy to setup, and the Fisheye and Fish-eye Distortion options improve images after the image is cropped. If you never use these features, you might want to leave them on. Every year, Adobe begins its max conference to discuss and announce its latest industry-focused technology. The keynote address is five and a half hours long. If you're as intrigued as I am, you should know ahead of time that the Photoshop CS6 release may be around the corner. Adobe has made a serious commitment to the Mac platform in recent years. This is largely due to the Mac's increase in popularity and the increasing demand from graphic designers. It's easier to get to know a file format when you actually use it. As a Mac user, Mac users who also need to use Photoshop can take advantage of Apple's print capabilities and connect their iPhones and iPads to their Macs, to view and work on documents wirelessly.
