Retouching images in Photoshop used to be much more akin to watercolor painting. If you cranked it up to a higher color saturation setting, you got a mess. Now, it's completely different. It's about the combination of dyes and pigments. The delta from what's available to what it might do is more robust. In the past, controlling and retaining the color saturation levels (i.e., not clipping) required adjusting the HSV (hue, saturation, and value) sliders. The newer update has it all baked in – they just control more of the image. You can have the exact colors that you want, and you can even fine tune the shape of your art if you want. My guess is that Adobe can do a good job on touch-ups, especially for LCDs and not so much on CRTs. Adobe Photoshop CS6/ Photoshop Lightroom 5.4 maybe the best on the market. The new features makes you live and love your DSLR. In addition, it doesn't feel like an overpriced software that it is. Photoshop CS6 and Lightroom 5.4 are the best from the two versions you are about to buy. They have new features and probably will be a blockbuster in the professional market. You can use it as a photo editor and make your photos as much as you want. You can do all kind of editing, making separation to adjust the color noticeably easier. You can perform retouching, in the same way, making the images warmer. You can even make a digital painting. And you can even use Photoshop-like features like layers and undo, for free now. The people who are really passionate about photography and can afford to pay would prefer buying Photoshop CS6
